The New Weapon of Knowledge

Dr. S. K. Saikia
Principal
DHSK College, Dibrugarh

The 21st century is the era of technology and information. Particularly the last decade of this century has witnessed unbridled changes in the overall scenario of teaching and learning in the field of technological applications. As we know this age has been called the fourth industrial revolution viewing the larger implications of the uses of IT and its relevant aspects. But surprisingly, the scenario in India is not up to the mark in this respect as no Indian institution of higher education which could stand among the top hundred institutes in the world as found in a recent study conducted by The Times Higher Education. It is needless to say that one of the reasons for such poor performance is inadequate applications of information technology and innovative approaches in the teaching-learning process in our educational institutes.

It however exemplifies that the need of the hour is to cope up with the changes worldwide. We need to take recourse to the modern innovative approaches in teaching. It is not only outdated but also impractical to see teachers engaging themselves merely in conventional 'chalk and talk' method today. It is the age of the fourth generation, of smart phones and of internet. Even the 'Make in India' concept emphasizes on digital applications. So it is imperative for all stakeholders of education to consider IT as the most useful weapon for expanding knowledge and quality education. The process of globalization now opens up the concept of knowledge. The knowledge of any person, any community, and any country can be easily communicated to any person of any remote place in world within a second with the help of the advantages given to mankind by IT. We must therefore encourage our teachers and students to take benefit from the blessings of IT in the new millennium. The world is moving fast, we should accelerate our speed to sustain in this fast moving world.
